HISTORY

The building at 9 Sikorskiego Street was built in 1896. It was designed by Jan Hojarczyk as 'Municipal Butcher's Stalls' in the Historicist style, leaving its red brick facade unplastered. The building housed 20 retail units, with sales taking place through windows, and butchers prepared their meat products inside.

After Poland regained independence, most of the butcher shops operating in Wieliczka at the time moved their operations to these stalls. Local butchers, often practicing their profession for generations, were renowned for their high-quality products, which enjoyed a reputation throughout the area. The bustling trade continued until the outbreak of World War II.

After the end of the German occupation, the building's function changed – during the communist era, some of the historic entrances and windows were bricked up, and the former interiors of the stalls were adapted to serve as offices for local institutions.

In the early 1990s, the building underwent another modernization, this time with retail and catering in mind. Although the interior underwent transformations, the exterior still boasts the original brick façade, with the outlines of the former commercial windows still visible.

In 2025, the premises underwent a complete interior renovation. From its inception, the building served as a meeting place for residents and local social life – today, the Kultowa restaurant continues this role.
